8.1.2006 - DAY 1153/94 Two years ago today I watched Paul, Evan, and Alsu go home. Two of the three were sentenced after me, within days of me. I've always believed that Russia did that because they had assumed they made the wrongfulness of my situation so obvious, so blatant, so undeniable, that I would be included at the last moment. Yet, I'm still here. Three weeks prior to that trade, in the courtroom, a State Department officer overheard my co-defendant accuser, ex-girlfriend, loudly and unabashedly admit that she "will never tell the court the whole truth about my setup." That officer was only two feet away from me as she blurted out her confession. We were making eye contact. That officer's face was riddled with shock at the revelation. I said to that officer, "Now you're a witness." That officer nodded with their eyes. "Now, you know." "Don't worry," that officer said, "I got this." What was witnessed was included in an official state department report. Yet, the Biden administration was uninterested in my recovery. Likely because I was not a fan of either him, nor of the previous Democratic administration. Their decision to abandon a known innocent American in the Russian prison system is both unconscionable, and further justification of my distaste for 21st century identity politics. During my appeal, two State Department officers confirmed in their official reports on my court session that my civil rights were violated, to wit the state-provided translator was wholly incompetent, and reported opposite meanings in their discussions with said translator. That my entire ordeal is replete with consistent violations of basic human and legal rights cannot be disputed seriously. Those violations are not only confirmed by the transcripts and the audio recordings from court, the physical evidence which consists of a translator competency document wholly lacking any English-language proficiency of any kind, but also government generated U.S. State Department reports that consistently indicate that at no point during my arrest, search, interrogation, arraignment, trial, appeal, and even extending to the legal documents I was provided by law, did the Russian government make more than a half-hearted and insincere effort to ensure that I understood what was going on. Watch the video from June 8th, 2023 that the police forced me to make. I said, "I don't even know what I'm accused of doing." It took months to even begin to understand the specifics. When we proved in court that it was nonsense, the judge closed his eyes to objectively heard evidence, deleted key testimony ^{that was} in my favor, and excused ^{or ignored} mountings of police misconduct. Why am I still not publicly declared wrongfully detained? What part was lawful? None of it.
